

EXPLORER'S QUEST

With forests covering their lower slopes and sharp peaks jutting into the sky, the mountain ranges of the world attract a very special type of explorer. The type willing to dodge bears and wolves, and brave the terrors of the death zone, so that they can be the first person to stand on top of a mountain. However, claiming the first ascent is not the only challenge for explorers in the forest and mountain zone.

Climb an unclimbed monster

Believe it or not there are lots of mountains in the world that no one has ever climbed. Some of them are almost as high as Mount Everest! You could write your name in the history books by being the first person to get to the top of one of these unclimbed monsters, but you will need to travel somewhere remote, like Greenland or eastern Tibet.

Circumnavigate the taiga belt

The taiga is the immense forest that runs in a belt around the top of the Earth. Pick the right route and you could circumnavigate (travel all the way around) the globe almost without leaving the forest, but would you be able to cope with bears, wolves and intense cold without losing your way?
